WOMAN, LOVELY WOMAN

BUT ALAS, WITHOUT BEAUTIFUL HAIR NO WOMAN CAN BE HANDSOME

A great many newspapers and magazines are printing pages on how a woman can be beautiful and keep beautiful.

And all of them, as you can see for yourself, admit that no woman can be really beautiful unless she has lustrous and luxuriant hair.

The women of Paris are, as a rule, beautiful, and a careful American observer who has traveled much claims that their beauty is due to their knowledge of how to keep their hair luxuriant, which they do by using a superior hair tonic.

Many American women are as wise as their French sisters, and that is why Parisian Sage, the quick acting and greatest of all hair restorers and tonics, is now having such a tremendous sale in America.

We ask every woman reader of this paper to give this marvelous hair beautifier a thorough trial, and we gladly make them this liberal offer:

Get a large 50-cent bottle from A. L. Bochner today. Use it as directed for two weeks. If at the end of that time you are not satisfied with results, say so to A. L. Bochner and he will give you your money back.

Besides being a delightful and invigorating hair dressing, Parisian Sage will cure dandruff, stop falling hair and itching of the scalp, or money back.

Mail orders filled, all charges prepaid by the American maker, G. H. Mfg. Co., Buffalo, N. Y. The girl with the Auburn hair is on every bottle.

all bids or proposals.

Phoenix Business College

Absolutely thorough. Twenty-three years experience. Every branch a specialty. Paragon Shorthand. Can be learned in ONE week, written faster than words can be articulated, and read when ice cold. Speed can be attained in four weeks from beginning sufficient for office. Do you believe it?

The truth at times may fail to win.

But victory will crown it in the end.

We admit that Pitman shorthand was great sixty years ago, but old things must pass away. In days of old, the traveler made his journey in the Ox Cart, but the "Overland Flyer" has taken its place. This busy world is moving in accelerating motion. Time is found wanting on all occasions, and if four weeks' moderate effort can accomplish more than seven months in sweat and toil, the wisdom of this age is going to take hold of it.

If you doubt the above, bring up your best system, select competent judges, and if we can not prove that Paragon Shorthand is far more legible, and can be written faster than any other, we will give an eighty dollar scholarship and fifteen dollar outfit of stationery included. We are in Phoenix to stay and our sleeves are up ready for trial.

Respectfully,

J. E. WOOTTON, President

DANIEL TANK AND THE UNFINISHED FIGHT

By P. C. Macfarlane.

Copyright, 1909, by the Pearson Publishing Company.

"You can't stop bribe-taking till you stop bribe giving," announced Mr. Tank, the Boss, with an air of finality.

As long as there's givers there's bound to be takers."

The occasion of this profound observation was the progress of an interview which Mr. Tank was enjoying with Mr. Richard Dunne, the editor and proprietor of a newspaper, who was just then engaged in a campaign of municipal reform. Mr. Dunne was near enough to forty to have accumulated plenty of good hard sense, and enough under it to have preserved bright and shining many of youth's ideals. He had force and a genuine for news getting. Unaided save by his own energies he had made himself the master, at thirty-five or thereabouts, of a great morning newspaper in a large city. Awake to the fact that the control of a journal of such circulation and standing gave him tremendous political power, he had determined not to use it selfishly, for his own advancement, but to make his city, which was notably the most boss-ridden in the United States, one of the most independent and best governed municipalities in the world. He had a sort of consciousness that it meant a long, unpleasant fight, but he knew that in the end he would be victorious. He would get the facts; he would hold them up to the sunlight through his paper and he had a childish faith in publicity. Sunlight will kill disease germs, the scientists tell us. So the reform movement began.

He put his cleverest men at work on the matter of the new wing of the City Hall. Through his paper, the Morning Sentinel, he showed that there had been serious improprieties in the letting of the contract, that inferior brick had gone into the building, that supposedly solid walls were only veneers with the interiors filled with trash. He printed pictures; he played up the stories; he culminated editorially; he dug open the municipal closet doors and pointed to the grinning skeletons and called upon the proper officials to act. There was much hubbub. There was talk and more talk. There was running to and fro of political henchmen. There was gathering of citizens in angry protest. The pulpit thundered, the woman's clubs resolved, and the Professors up at the university postulated. The City Council even appointed investigating committees. The District Attorney announced that he would bring the matter to the attention of the Grand Jury. The Judges solemnly selected the Grand Jury and charged it, and it elected a foreman and proceeded to hear the law from the District Attorney, and to hear the reports of various committees, and to interrogate witnesses, and then the day for the voting of indictments came.

But no indictments resulted.

The City Government was firmly in the grasp of the Tank Machine. The Tank Machine was, first and foremost, Daniel Tank, himself, coarse, rugged, beefy, who held the thickly populated wards in a grasp of iron and who cheerfully bought and sold the rights of the people at the prices current but after a fashion all his own. His boasted assumption of a fatherly attitude involved the further assumption that the people did not know how to govern themselves nor care to bother about it, together with the astonishing presumption that he both knew how to govern and did so patriotically. If he profited by the exercise of his prerogative it was but by something in the nature of contingent fees.

Since he was at much pains to govern the City, the City should not object that he was well paid for it, especially as he did not make the collections out of the City Treasury but out of the bursting coffers of complacent corporations.

Tank was a scoundrel individual and his army was ruthless over those whom he sold and those to whom he sold, alike. As for the rest of the machine, it consisted on the one hand, as Dunne well knew, of half a dozen district leaders, and on the other hand of what Dunne barely even suspected. Donnelly of the Trading Company, Manning, who represented controlling interests in gas, light and telephone companies, and Macy of the Combined Trust Companies, all of whom had of long time found it to their interest to secretly wear the Tankian collar.

It chanced that on the very afternoon that the Grand Jury dropped the investigation, Mr. Dunne, driving down town in his motor car, met Mr. Daniel Tank, driving down town in his. Tank was a big, amiable sort of a man with a huge, insensate face and small blue eyes that looked out of place set so brightly in that leathery countenance. Little ripples gathered round the eyes of Tank, the Boss, and he smiled as he spoke to Mr. Dunne, the Reformer. Mr. Dunne responded with dignity, his own shallow cheeks flattening as his jaw tightened resolutely. Tank seemed to be laughing at him.

This far the reform movement lacked something. The city had been looted. No doubt of that. But by whom? This the investigations had failed to show. This much Mr. Dunne had felt might be left to the officials. He had let it lie. He had torn aside the veil. He had flung open the closet door. The skeleton grinned, but as it grinned, also seemed to wink a hollow eye. Mr. Dunne had been amazed. The criminals had lost themselves in the crowd. The city officials had busied themselves. They had held up holy hands. They had expressed doubt and dismay and determination to detect the offenders and punish them, but got no farther. After six months there were no indictments and no arrests and no progress.

Mr. Dunne learned to his dismay that the very day he met Tank in the street in his motor car, Tank had bargained away for forty thousand dollars a trolley franchise for five price-less blocks on a great street, and it had gone through the Transportation Committee and the City Council thereafter with such precision as things go only when the tracks are greased and switches are closed and locked ahead by prearrangement.
